

Subscribe now

Sign up to our newsletter for news, offers and great exclusive competitions
Click here for more details

Clock

Search

Home | Restaurants | Drink | Cooking | Food | Books | B.log | Competition | Features | About Us | Subscribe |

Articles November 2009

A Increase | Decrease | Reset

Cook, Eat & Run. Fast food at L'Atelier de Chefs

Nick Harman

Thursday November 5, 2009 8:30 am

What are your plans for lunchtime? A cold sandwich at your 'workstation' perhaps? How about something in a Tupperware box brought in from home? Maybe a dodgy pie and chips in the pub? There's always a restaurant, of course, but these days who can afford the risk of being late back? Only the bosses have that little luxury left and they aren't picking up the bill for their three-course lunch like you are.

So what about learning to cook squid stuffed with chorizo and swiftly eating it before the hooter goes to summon you back to the factory? Now that's a working lunch we can all get behind.

Atelier de Chefs on Wigmore Street is half fancy cookware shop and half working teaching kitchen.

It's not actually an atelier in the literal sense; it's on the basement and ground floors, but it is a genuine workplace for artists. They run cookery courses non stop here, from early in the day until well into the evening, and when they aren't doing that, they are being used to host foodie launches and events.

You can choose from a multitude of courses aimed at all levels of expertise but we went for the temptingly named Cook, Eat & Run. At 12:30 a disparate group of people, around twelve in all, assembled around the steel tables of the kitchen buckling on disposable aprons and eyeing up bowls of squid, chorizo, onion, red pepper and assorted other ingredients. This is a recipe designed to be chucked together when arriving home slightly frazzled from work and hopefully with a stiff drink close to hand.

Chef Andre Dupin called us to order and we dutifully lined up for instruction, his manner efficient and professional but not unfriendly. He showed us how to chop an onion into those perfect little cubes you see on telly. I've read about how you do this a score of times but never finally 'got it' until now. Watching Andre do it finally made it click and now I do it at home all the time, even if we aren't eating onions, it's so satisfying a trick. It also, as Andre explains, stops the eye-watering effect that onions usually have which comes from hacking the onion to bits, crushing it rather than slicing it so that it then releases the volatile compounds that reduce you to tears.

The same chop technique can also be used for garlic as he showed us, but that was getting a bit Bonsai for me. My fat fingers and I will have to stick to whacking the clove with the flat of a blade and then mincing. Even so, the 'claw' technique of holding an item when chopping that we were shown will come in useful for making sure I can continue to play the piano with all eight fingers.

So then it was back to the chopping boards at our stations and equal division of labour. Each table of four was catering for itself, so one person chopped chorizo, one the onions, one the chilli (remembering not to wipe eyes halfway through or suffer the pain) and so on. As we were against the clock, speed was of the essence and good chopping technique lessened waste of materials and time.

And then the stoves with a volunteer from each group taking up the pan. Oil hissed and spat and those of us leaning in with our pocket digital cameras leapt back sharply wiping the lenses and slightly singed arms. With all the ingredients fried off it was back to the boards.

condoms stuffed and ready for the pan.

They say life is too short to stuff a courgette flower; well stuffing a baby squid is pretty fiddly too. First pull out the 'quill' that may have been left inside, then attempt to shove the chorizo mixture in with a teaspoon that's demonically just fractionally bigger than the squid's opening. Then try using the back end of the spoon, then with increasing frustration just start ramming the mixture in any way you can. After a bit the squid becomes alarmingly tumescent with filling and the skin drum tight. Result. Seal the end with a cocktail stick, breaking off the excess, and you have what appears to be a pan of factory-reject

Foodepedia recommends you read...

- ★ Restaurant Vouchers
- ★ Chocolate heaven found in Flanders
- ★ Persian 'Mirza Ghasemi' Aubergines
- ★ Roux at Parliament Square opens 10 May
- ★ Coming events
- ★ Openings in May
- ★ Latest restaurant reviews

- ★ Persian 'Mirza Ghasemi' Aubergines
- ★ Petrus, Kinnerton Street, Knightsbridge
- ★ Chocolate heaven found in Flanders
- ★ Thermomix - the greatest kitchen gadget ever?
- ★ Roux at Parliament Square opens 10 May

Most popular this week

- ★ Grosvenor House Hotel's Afternoon Tea - a Red Letter Day (re-visited)
- ★ Chocolate heaven found in Flanders
- ★ Michel Roux Junior opens new restaurant in Parliament Square
- ★ Thermomix - the greatest kitchen gadget ever?
- ★ Viajante, London

Most popular this month

- ★ Grosvenor House Hotel's Afternoon Tea - a Red Letter Day (re-visited)
- ★ Chocolate heaven found in Flanders
- ★ Thermomix - the greatest kitchen gadget ever?
- ★ Michel Roux Junior opens new restaurant in Parliament Square
- ★ Viajante, London

More in this section...

- ★ Smeus is the word - Prawns and mash are a gourmet delight in Ostend
- ★ Cracking crabs at Trishna
- ★ Fetzter wines. The green way to drink
- ★ To market, to market...or not.
- ★ Creating the cupcake - we taste a few cookery courses to see which is the icing on the top

They take no time at all, just a few minutes while the skin sears a nice colour and the tentacles spasmodically curl up. Out of the pan and onto the plate with the rocket and sliced baby plum tomatoes. Next door a long table is laid and we cart off our plates in triumph.

I have to say that mine was pretty tasty, but then as a veteran of cookery courses I made sure I was eating ones that someone else prepared and not me. A glass of wine to wash it down, a quick check of what other people had sneaked away from, 'we're IT geeks!' two men cheerfully informed me, 'this seemed like a something different to do at lunchtime,' and it was off and out and back to work.

The courses at Atelier change all the time and so it's best to check out their website to book ahead, especially as they fill up fast. Fun, affordable and suitable for everyone they also help you take home skills that will be useful for ages. If ever anyone asks, 'Is there a squid stuffer in the house?' I will be elbowing my way to the front saying 'Stand back please, I'm a professional

<http://www.atelierdeschefs.co.uk/>

Foodepedia

Article Archive
Contact Us
Privacy Policy
Terms and Conditions

Features

Food
Books
B.log
Competition
Features

Restaurants

Reviews
Openings
News
Offers
Vouchers

©2009 Foodepedia. All rights reserved.

Bookmark this

More

Related articles...

- ★ Two Michelin Starred Chef, Pino Lavarra, joins the Brunello Restaurant team at The Baglioni Hotel for 5 evenings only.
- ★ Daniel Clifford brings 5 top chefs to Cambridge for 5 nights of Michelin starred dining in aid of Children in Need
- ★ The Landmark London to participate in "Chefs for Heroes" charity event on 2 October 2009